

More Possible Causes

Society distorts masculine and feminine roles to the point that some men feel they are not “strong” in their masculinity, and some women feel that they lack “nurturing” tendencies. There is nothing wrong with a man who doesn’t fit into the expected social roles, or one who is not the “macho football player” type. Actually, most men are not football player types. Men come in many different sizes, interests, and personalities. Some are artistic or musically inclined. These types of roles or interests do not diminish their innate masculinity. At the same time, some women find working on cars or hunting enjoyable. Such interests don’t diminish a woman’s innate nurturing, caring, and feminine capacities.

When someone struggles with his or her own God-given gender, an internal war takes place. A person who rejects his or her own gender is in a precarious place because the intensity of those feelings increase are hard to overcome. His or her ultimate self-view is often the product of input from others significant in life, such as peers and role models. Other times, the intensity of one’s gender struggle may emerge during a very difficult time in life when stress is high, or when trauma takes place.

People who experiment with cross dressing may believe it will help medicate the pain of not feeling sufficient in their God-assigned gender. They experiment with thoughts and behaviors of the opposite sex, believing that they are in control of the experimental bouts and with crossing gender lines. The end result is a gradual, steady emotional dependence on the excitement and pleasure that it seemingly brings. Contrary to this belief, cross dressing often gradually takes charge of them.
