

You belong to the Inuit. They welcome each other by banging the fist against head and shoulder.

You belong to the Eipo in New Guinea. They welcome each other by silence.

You belong to the Dani in New Guinea. They welcome each other by hugging and crying for a considerable amount of time.

You belong to the Loango. They welcome each other by clapping their hands.

You belong to the Assyries. They welcome each other by exchanging their clothes.

You belong to the Germans. They welcome each other by shaking hands.

You belong to the Indians. They welcome each other by putting the palms of their hands together and holding their hands in front of their body and bowing.

You belong to the Latin Americans. They welcome each other by putting their head on the right shoulder of their partner and three strokes on the back, then putting the head on the left shoulder of the partner and three strokes on the back.

You belong to the Mongolians. They welcome each other by sniffing at each others' cheeks and rubbing their noses.