Abstract
This paper presents the framing of an engineering and marketing/business interdisciplinary “fifth-year” graduate program which would enable engineering students to move “off the bench” and into innovation/product development process professionals. This is a step-up without being a typical “engineering management” program. The assessment process of this program concept is discussed.