Parents: Check Out Gap Year Ideas to Inspire Your Kids

Is your child soon finishing school? Many young people benefit greatly from a gap year, whether it's after completing high school or post-secondary, or between degrees or years of schooling. Here are some smart ways they can make the most of this time to gain skills and experiences to help with future job opportunities.

Travel on a working holiday. This rewarding twist on seeing the world combines the cultural learnings of travel with the opportunity to earn money to fund the experience or start saving. Thanks to International Experience Canada, a government program for youth ages 18 to 35, your child could spend their gap year exploring Australia, France or another of over 30 partner countries while gaining international work experience and earning money in the process.

Local or global volunteering. Spending some time helping others or supporting a worthy cause is a great way for young people to gain skills and valuable life experience while working to find their purpose. Connecting with like-minded people and contributing to a greater good can help your son or daughter discover their priorities and what truly matters to them. Depending on their goals for their gap year, they can volunteer at community-based initiatives near home or abroad.

Test-drive an industry. Committing a chunk of a gap year to an internship and getting work experience is an excellent idea for kids who are looking for a break but still want to get ahead. Interning looks great on any resume, and lets young people try out an industry with little risk before signing up to a full-time job. It's also possible to do an internship in another country through IEC. Whether it's done at home or abroad, at the end of the internship, your child will know they either need to keep exploring or are on the right track, with the bonus of having made valuable connections in the field.

January is Alzheimer Awareness Month

The Canadian Charter of Rights for People with Dementia

If you or a loved one are among the more than half a million Canadians living with dementia, it's possible you've experienced or witnessed some form of discrimination or stigma as a result. Because it's sometimes difficult for people with dementia to stand up for their rights, the Alzheimer's

Society of Canada has released the Canadian Charter of Rights for People with Dementia.

Created by the society's advisory group, the Charter of Rights was written by and for people living with dementia. It ensures that those afflicted can become aware of their rights and empowers them to advocate for themselves. It also enables caregivers who support people with dementia to become familiar with these rights.

The charter includes the right to:

- Be free from discrimination of any kind
- Benefit from Canada's civic and legal rights
- Participate in developing and implementing policies that affect their lives
- Access support that allows them to live independently and be engaged in their community

Memories are erased
a little more each day but remain engraved in our hearts for always

• Access the information and support needed to participate in decisions regarding their own care and diagnosis

• Expect that their doctors and caregivers are trained in human rights and are held accountable for protecting these rights

• Access effective complaint and appeal procedures when their rights aren't protected or respected

Not only will this charter help people with dementia advocate for themselves, it will also allow policy makers, health and social service providers and other government agencies to identify the changes that are needed to improve the lives and treatment of people with dementia and their caregivers. HOW TO SCALE UP YOUR SMALL BUSINESS

Thanks to the internet, starting your own business has never been easier. If you're a small business owner and want to take your idea to the next level, here are some tips to grow your success.

Find a versatile payment processor. As you expand your operations, you'll likely start selling your products in many spaces, including in-store, online or even on-the-go if you're a contractor or artisan. To make sure you can accept credit cards, debit cards, cash and more, wherever your business takes you, look for a payment processor that offers all-in-one solutions.

Protect your intellectual property (IP) assets. You wouldn't hesitate to get insurance or other protection for your physical assets, like your store or merchandise. But you likely also have valuable IP assets worth protecting, such as a business name or logo. If you protect them, they can give your business a competitive advantage over other players in the market. Your IP assets have the potential of making you a great deal of money, especially if you're exporting globally.

Start thinking globally. Exporting to an international market can be an exciting way to expand your business, but you need to take the necessary steps to do it right. Start developing a plan by asking yourself some key questions: Will I be operating my business in other countries besides Canada? If so, which ones? Do I think I will ever export or manufacture outside of Canada? Do I have the financial resources to obtain intellectual property protection in other countries?

Tip: If you're in the earlier stages of business development and have an online store, you can start by selling your products that way. When it comes to bricks-and-mortar operations, start by testing and refining your business model in your home country before exporting.

Tips For Getting Rid Of Student Loans

Living with student debt can be demoralizing, but it doesn't have to take over your life. Here's how to take charge of your student loans.

MAKE A REPAYMENT PLAN

Knowing the value and interest rate of each of your loans will help you figure out how to pay off your loans efficiently. Use a student loan calculator to find the best repayment strategy for your situation, taking into account loan interest rates.

Avoid paying only the monthly minimums. It'll take longer to pay the loans and cost more in interest.

USE THE AVALANCHE OR SNOWBALL METHOD

The avalanche method for tackling debt involves making the minimum payments on all your loans and then putting left-over money toward your loan with the highest interest rate. Once that loan is paid, focus on the loan with the second-highest interest rate.

The snowball method works similarly except instead of prioritizing loans with high interest rates, you start by paying off loans with the lowest balances.

You'll save more money and time with the avalanche method, but the snowball method is often more effective because the relief of paying off one loan motivates you to continue making payments.

DON'T DESPAIR

As long as you make payments part of your budget, you'll be living within your means while slowly but steadily paying off your loans. Consider finding other ways to supplement your income (a roommate, a second job, etc.) and try to maintain your frugal student lifestyle to keep living costs in check.

Congratulations to Tumbler Ridge who was crowned the 2019 SledTown ShowDown Champion! It came down to Tumbler Ridge and Flin Flon Manitoba, sitting at 50%-50% almost the entire time and it really came down to the very last few hours to determine the winner. Over 100,000 votes were counted, in total. Ultimately Tumbler Ridge won with just over 200 more votes.

Tumbler Ridge beat out Golden in Round 1, Blue River in Round 2, Revelstoke in Round 3 and Sicamous in Round 4; earning their way to compete for 2019's supreme champ, where they scooped up that title for 2019.
