Birthright trip to Israel in December

by Adam Zelenka

I arrived back in the United States on Wednesday, Jan. 7, at about 5 in the morning. I was excited that the next day I would be having sushi with my friends and telling them all about my trip, my spiritual journey. I had about a 10-hour layover at JFK to reflect on what those past 10 days meant to me.

BREAK
I awaited an open space to pray at the Western Wall, and I looked at everyone leaning, eyes closed, with their heads against their forearms against the wall. I realized I hadn’t thought about what to pray for. I’m not a super sentimental guy, and when I ask myself deep questions I find myself producing thoughts at a faster rate than I can put words to them in my head, a series of intimations diverging towards parts unknown. So I had a hard time deciding what to write on my note to place in the Kotel. And when I closed my eyes and put my head against my forearm with everyone else, my prayers were a little jumbled. Whatever diffused through my forearm into eternity had something to do with making sure everything turned out okay for the people in my life, mainly an assortment of images really, I couldn’t quite put it in words. So I thanked Hashem for everything he has given me, said the Shehecheyanu, and vacated my wall space. I think I did alright.

That was one of the things I thought about at the airport, as I sat yet unwilling to crack open the book I bought for 20 shekels at some mall en route from Jerusalem to Tel Aviv. The book by Dostoevsky. This brought to my mind something that had occurred to me two or three times before on my journey.

GRATITUDE
I was so thankful that the state of Israel exists and that I got to go there. The first time that occurred to me was during a talk in Tzfat with Avraham Loewenthal, who said, “Our Jewish ancestors have been praying three times a day for next year in Jerusalem. For 2000 years! That’s a lot of prayers!” And I was like “Oh man, that’s like—so many prayers, man! And the fact that I’m here. With you guysyyyyyyyy.”

The second time that happened was New Year’s. We were staying that night with the Bedouins. One of the activities was a desert meditation circle, in which we all sat or lay down quietly in the sand and then shared our thoughts. It was cold and a little rainy (wonder of wonders, miracle of miracles, it was raining in the Negev!), but we were out there. I was on a derailed train of thought, as per usual. It was overwhelming and surreal, and I sort of had to grip the dirt with my fingers to make sure what I felt was real.

And out of fairness to the other things we did on the trip, because every day was spiritual and intellectually meaningful, I’ll count the rest of the trip as the third time it occurred to me how thankful I was for a the Jewish State in the land of Israel. I am thankful to have met the IDF soldiers who accompanied us. And I am glad I got to hear their stories at Har Herzl, of the fallen soldiers they knew or of whom they knew. I am so thankful that at the end of Yad Vashem, the corridor opens outward to Jerusalem, which I can tell you really does look golden in the sunset.

RETURN
Any kid who just got back from a Taglit-Birthright trip will tell you he can’t wait to get back to Israel as soon as possible. To me at least, it feels exactly like home (Hebrew everywhere and I don’t have to think twice about drinking beer...). I think I went and asked people if they felt the same way and I think they did. And of course, I’m still excited about the trip, and I hope everyone else is too.

Any kid who just got back from a Taglit-Birthright trip will tell you he can’t wait to get back to Israel as soon as possible.

2015 UJFT Mission to the Jewish Community of Argentina

October 14 - 21, 2015

Mark your calendars.
Space is limited!
Itinerary in final stages of construction.

$3,780* per person
(Does not include airfare to and from the U.S.)

* Based on double occupancy.
Covers all lodging, most meals, all air and ground transportation in Argentina, tour bus, guides, speakers, admissions, and most other program costs.

A MINIMUM OF 25 PARTICIPANTS NEEDED TO MAKE THE MISSION A “GO!”

Email or call Amy Zelenka at azelenka@ujft.org or 965-6139 to add your name to the list of 2015 UJFT Argentina mission participants!

24 | JEWISH NEWS | February 9, 2015 | jewishnewsva.org

Adam Zelenka is a freshman at Virginia Tech. He is the son of Amy and Frank Zelenka, a graduate of Hebrew Academy of Tidewater and a graduate of the International Baccalaureate Program at Princess Anne High School in Virginia Beach.